NEW QUESTION: 3

While at a government-operated facility, you are attempting to troubleshoot a wireless LAN performance problem using a wireless protocol analyzer. When you start capturing frames, you see a proprietary layer 2 protocol running over the 802.11g network as shown in this screenshot. The facility's wireless LAN administrator confirms that this protocol is proprietary and used for both data encryption and compression. How will this affect the steps you take to troubleshoot performance problems on this wireless LAN?

- A. Troubleshooting will be hindered, but not eliminated because only part of the information needed for performance measurements by the analyzer is encrypted. Each Data frame's MAC header will be encrypted, but the PLCP header can still be decoded successfully.
- B. In order to troubleshoot performance problems on a network using a proprietary encryption protocol, you must use a wireless protocol analyzer that has integrated support for the protocol in use.
- C. The proprietary encryption protocol will have no effect on your troubleshooting steps because the wireless LAN analyzer can still decode the PLCP and MAC headers of Data frames. This situation is essentially no different than troubleshooting a wireless LAN that uses WEP.
- D. As long as you load the proprietary client software onto your analyzer computer, you will be able to see all of the Data frames fully decoded. Doing this will allow you to troubleshoot the wireless LAN as though no encryption were in use.
